Ethics in Evaluation

We human beings constantly face values choices: better and worse, right and wrong. Thinking about ethics helps us sharpen our analysis and solidify our principles for coping with our more difficult moral dilemmas. In evaluation practice, those dilemmas can arise before a project commences (Is this evaluation worth doing?), through the planning and investigation stages (Can this methodology and these resources produce reliable findings?), to reporting and beyond (Does the report 'speak truth to power'). The biggest challenges evaluators face are often ethical in nature. They may arise because the expectations or commitments of clients and other parties conflict with those of the evaluator.

The workshop is intended to:

- Increase participants' awareness of ethics in evaluation
- Increase participants' grasp of ethical principles
- Enhance their ability to carry out an approach to resolving ethical issue
- Encourage discussion of professional standards and codes of ethical conduct in evaluation and research;
- Discuss principles of ethical discernment offered by philosophy and used in applied organizational ethics
- Share the results of a 2011 CES survey on this topic
- Share a practical eight-step process for ethical decision-making that starts with identifying a challenge and ends with action.

The workshop facilitator, Robert Czerny is an experienced evaluator with the C.E. designation, and serves as President of the Ethics Practitioners' Association of Canada.
